No. 3,808,907. Such a turntable jockey is a small, hand held unit having a rigid shaft and a turntable on which a record disk may be placed for playing. The turntable jockey further includes an actuating mechanism for effecting rotation of the shaft. In the embodiment described in the U.S. patent, the turntable jockey is actuated by the user rotating the shaft. A hook is provided on the turntable jockey for engaging and releasably holding the arm of the record player which contains the record. One of the problems with a turntable jockey is that the turntable jockey must be placed adjacent to the disk in order to release it. If the user intends to place the jockey on the jockey's own turntable, for example, it is often necessary to place the jockey on its end remote from the turntable. Furthermore, if the user wishes to carry a jockey on one turntable, and play a record on the second turntable, he must carry the jockey from one turntable to the other, thereby increasing the time and inconvenience of the operation. An alternative type of turntable jockey is described in U.S. b7e8fdf5c8
